

YOUR FATE IS SACRIFICE

some dedicate their life to the cause.

one day, you all will dedicate everything.

TIPS

- at the beginning, your characters may not be able to envision that they would give their lives for their cause. what could change this? how do you bring your characters closer to that source of change?
- you know that your sacrifice is coming, but your characters do not. explore what loose ends they might tie up, and what would motivate them to, even if they don't know it is their last chance. also consider: what threads are left hanging, in the suddenness of loss?

CHARACTERS SHARING THIS FATE

CLOCK

cover or strike through as you advance the clock

TRIGGER any player may trigger intentionally or notice in play ask characters to follow you into a mission that has impossible odds. each character who agrees shares this fate. any player who later decides to aid the mission may choose to join this fate.

FATE MOVES

any player sharing this fate may use to advance the clock

1. introduce a threat standing in the way of your mission.
2. reveal the chance to escape, within a rapidly closing window. fated characters must choose individually whether to retreat or forge on to the objective. those who retreat are spared this fate and no longer share it—instead, they must live to tell.
3. observe that the objective of your mission is in sight, but that it lies behind a grave obstacle.
4. each character who shares this fate gains the move “sacrifice yourself for the cause, and show how your final act is critical to moving your party towards their ultimate goal. if there are any players that share this fate but have not yet invoked this move, you may give them your remaining tokens. this move may be invoked without any tokens.”

designers' note: what it means to sacrifice yourself is left purposefully vague. players are encouraged to interpret it as they wish. two facts should always remain true: that sacrifice should be grave, and other players should use their characters or the pillars to highlight the gravity of the character's sacrifice. this is a serious and quite likely final moment for a character; everyone at the table should take responsibility for honoring the weight of the moment and supporting the player in demonstrating their sacrifice in whatever way that player finds most fulfilling.
