

PSY 223 Study Guide Exam 1 (chapters 1-5)

Chapter 1:

Cognition: higher mental processes such as thinking, perceiving, deciding, and using memory

Cognitive Neuroscience: the biological basis for higher mental processes. Explaining and discovering the “how” of information processing.

Serial Processing: the idea that the brain has to separately process two units of input and cannot process them both at once, works for simpler ideas, slower

Parallel Processing: we can perceive several inputs/stimuli at once and incorporate them into one decision and response; higher order functioning

Phrenology: (an old idea)

- Study of the brain in terms of skull topography
- Brain is organ of mind, divided into many faculties
- Division sizes correspond with skull changes (bumps/sizes/etc.)
- What we've kept → different parts of the brain = different functions
- What we've added → how we perceive, recognize, and react to information

Neuron:

Cell body: nucleus, genetic material

Dendrite: branching structure that receive input from other neurons

Myelin Sheath: fatty insulation that speeds signal transfer (lacking myelin may cause delay in movement, jerky movement or slow responding)

Axon: transmits action potential, produces output to other neurons

Action Potential: electrical signal that propagates down the axon to release neurotransmitters (chemical)

- (+) Charges move into the neuron leaving a (-) charge outside
