These three elements, the what (things, activities, tasks), where (places, spaces) and when (time) elements, together form the what-where-when triad. The what element represents a concrete thing, activity, or place, whereas the where and when elements are abstract, representing the spatial and temporal configurations, respectively, of the what element. The where element represents the spatial configuration of the what element, and the when element represents the temporal configuration of the what element. The what-where-when triad is a fundamental concept in the study of human-environment interactions, and it is used to describe the spatial and temporal configurations of human activities and the environment. The what-where-when triad is a fundamental concept in the study of human-environment interactions, and it is used to describe the spatial and temporal configurations of human activities and the environment.
