

My Teaching Reflection

Teaching is a complex process. In a teaching process, the teacher has to be in consideration many aspects in order to make that process, successful and interesting. A teacher has to be concerned not only with the methodology that s/he applies in his/her class, but also how that methodology and strategies will affect to their students in the future learning process.

As we know, a good learning experience advantages to constant achievements, whereas a bad one could have consequences for the children; thus the work and creativity teachers carry on every class becomes really important because the learning process of the students will depend on them.

A book which I consider really interesting and I loved it is "The Practice of English Language Teaching" where Jeremy Harmer (2001) states that "Within the general area of methodology, people talk about approaches, methods, techniques, procedures, and models, all of which go into the practice of English teaching"; here we realize that the teacher does not only spend time with children in a classroom, but a teacher implies several aspects that will have an impact on the students.

As my experience, I used to think that teaching was only in a classroom and teach what the learners need, however when I started to study and entered in a school, I realized that my thought was wrong. Inside a classroom exists another reality, every group is different and thus they have different necessities. So for a class to be successful, it must be constructed by a specific methodology, strategies, interesting material and activities.

Personally, I prefer the PPP (Presentation, Practice, and Production) during kinder and primary level and in secondary school, I prefer Communicative Approach (According to Jeremy Harmer (2009), the PPP approach is widely used during the teaching process at lower levels. Which I totally agree, because during the first years that students learn the second language, it is difficult that the students could produce it without problems, however, a lesson plan developed with this approach and with creativity, makes that at the finish of the lesson, the students could produce chunks using the second language.
