

Medication and Test Prescription by Nurses

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

The adherence problem is mainly caused by high drug prices, which can be solved either by drug price rate regulations or by providing medical aid to patients without sufficient resources. Nurses should always ask if a patient can afford the desired medicine. It will ensure that there will be full adherence to the treatment, but if a patient cannot afford the medication, nurses should provide the most effective treatment for the patient's financial situation. Therefore, the most important recommendation for nurses is to be able to design alternative treatments adjusted to patients' needs (Gipson, Kelly, McKinney, & White, 2017). It will lead to the overall improvement in adherence without which the most effective treatment procedures are useless.

The affordability factor can only be influenced by either lowering the cost or increasing the income. The latter is impossible to integrate on the national scale, which makes low-cost drugs a priority. The best plausible solution is to remove or reduce the amount of patent-related regulations because the patented product does not operate in the competitive market. This leads to an uncontrolled drug price increase, which is a similar occurrence in monopolistic organizations (Gipson et al., 2017). Patented drugs should be rewarded by a shorter exclusion timeframe, which is compensated with monetary rewards. This will eliminate the risk of research motivation loss; however, it will allow other competitor companies to produce drugs, which reduces the inflated medication price.

Because several patients do not inform advanced practice nursing clinicians on the causes of cost-related medication non-adherence, nurses should encourage the discussion of the given topic. The prescription process must be modified to be highly patient-oriented, which will solve the issue of affordability and alternative planning (Hammond, Chiu, Painter, & Meena, 2018). The primary approach should be focused on an open discussion, which can be achieved by making the conversation on finances as comfortable as possible because it is a delicate topic. In addition, patients should be informed of the downsides of choosing less expensive treatments and drugs to allow them to make a conscious and deliberate choice.
