service This book provides guidance for how to recruit select and retain the right people for leadership positions at any level of the organization Drawing from research conducted in the private public and non profit sectors Thoms features powerful examples of effective and ineffective leadership in a variety of situations and sheds light on the complex relationships between leaders and those who follow them We all choose our leaders We hire them to run our companies We vote them into office We appoint them to committees We decide to work for serve and follow them In fact all leadership is relative by taking direction or orders going to bat or war marching behind listening and agreeing we are choosing to allow another individual to lead us Whether the stage is a corporation a country a club a school or any other organization effective leaders matter Yet despite such high profile examples of leadership disasters from the California recall of Gray Davis to the fall of such business titans as Ken Lay and Sam Waksal we continue to choose hire and elect poor leaders Finding the Best and Brightest explores this phenomenon in business politics and other sectors of society and proposes an antidote an approach to choosing leaders based on a set of criteria designed to align individual qualities with organizational or institutional goals Peg Thoms challenges the popular trend toward transformational leadership which focuses on identifying universal characteristics arguing instead that leadership must be developed in context Many organizations for example need operational leaders who can focus on present day tasks such as designing superior products and delivering exceptional customer service and not inspirational or visionary leaders whose otherwise admirable qualities might be ill suited to the challenges at hand Outlining six typical leadership search scenarios from school principal to hospital CEO Thoms shows readers how to identify the traits and behaviors that are most essential for the position and how to structure interviews and other search techniques to elicit the most informative responses and home in on the best candidates She also reminds us that many organizations fail not because they can t find good leaders but because they can t keep them and offers strategies to promote leadership development Whether you are an executive giving the nod to a new department head a concerned citizen casting your vote for a municipal councilman a club member choosing a new president or an aspiring leader deciding which offer will provide the greatest growth opportunities Finding the Best and the Brightest offers fresh insights on the dynamic relationship between leaders and those who follow them Forensic Neuropsychology PhD Glenn J.
