 Justify your choice, and for those you did not choose, explain why they are incorrect.
- How would you go about finding the number of “chalk molecules” it takes to write your name on the board? Explain what you would need to do and provide a sample calculation.
- These questions concern the work of J. J. Thomson:
 - From what you know of Thomson’s work, which particles do you think he would believe are most important in the formation of compounds (chemical changes) and why?
 - Of the remaining two subatomic particles, which do you place second in importance for forming compounds and why?
 - Propose three models that explain Thomson’s findings and evaluate them. Include Thomson’s findings.
- Heat is applied to an ice cube in a closed container until only steam is present. Draw a representation of this process, assuming you can see it at an extremely high level of magnification. What happens to the size of the molecules? What happens to the total mass of the sample?

- One of the best indications of a useful theory is that it raises more questions for further experimentation than it originally answered. Is this true of Dalton’s atomic theory? Give examples.
- Dalton assumed that all atoms of the same element are identical in all their properties. Explain why this assumption is not valid.
- How does Dalton’s atomic theory account for each of the following?
 - the law of conservation of mass
 - the law of definite proportion
 - the law of multiple proportions
- What refinements had to be made in Dalton’s atomic theory to account for Gay-Lussac’s results on the combining volumes of gases?
- Which (if any) of the following can be determined by knowing the number of protons in a neutral element? Explain your answer.
 - the number of neutrons in the neutral element
 - the number of electrons in the neutral element
 - the name of the element
- The average mass of a carbon atom is 12.011. Assuming you were able to pick up only one carbon atom, the chance that you would randomly get one with a mass of 12.011 is
 - 0.011%.
 - about 12%.
 - 12.011%.
