

Breast Surgery Fellowship

Personal Statement

The numbers are staggering. Every year nearly 250,000 women will develop breast cancer. More than 60,000 new cases of carcinoma in situ (CIS) will be diagnosed, and, of that number, close to 50,000 women will die.

In many ways, we have gone through a cultural transformation. Virtually everyone knows someone – a friend, family, co-worker, or fellow student – who has contracted this disease. As we see pink ribbons abound, unity increases the fortitude of every involved medical professional resolved to see this invasive killer defeated within their lifetime. When I began my exploration of breast surgery oncology, I soon learned that expertise is vital for imaging, pathology, reconstructive surgery, radiation oncology, and medical oncology as well. While focusing on my role in the operating theater, I felt it was critical to have substantial knowledge of all aspects of disease management. Thus, in residency, when introduced to classifying and evaluating mammographic abnormalities, developing an understanding of indications, techniques and complications of image-guided breast biopsy, learning how best to counsel patients on treatment options for local therapy of breast cancer, and becoming proficient in common breast surgical procedures with emphasis on oncoplastic techniques, I felt far more empowered to assume the role in which I so passionately sought advanced certification.

The turning point came early in rotations. Her name was Jillian, and she was the mother of three gorgeous toddlers. As she sat on the bed waiting for a double mastectomy to begin, her husband quietly told me that half their parish had shaved their heads in support. An avalanche of cards from her kindergarten class covered three walls in her room. Although the surgery went extremely well, and all were thrilled, within four months, she was gone. Many med students and residents speak of an afflicted mother, sister, or friend when speaking of their motivation to join this fight. In my case, her name was and will always be Jillian, and with the strength of memory, I am ready to continue giving my all to an inestimably valuable cause.
