

The Variety of Maps

(by David Smith)

Maps are designed to show us the world as it is, but they are also designed to show us the world as we want it to be. They are a reflection of our own biases and prejudices, and they are a reflection of the power of the mapmaker. Maps are not just tools for navigation; they are also tools for persuasion and control.

The mapmaker's choice of what to include and what to exclude is a powerful statement. It is a statement about what is important and what is not important. It is a statement about what is real and what is not real. Maps are not just tools for navigation; they are also tools for persuasion and control. The mapmaker's choice of what to include and what to exclude is a powerful statement. It is a statement about what is important and what is not important. It is a statement about what is real and what is not real.
