GENERATOR TROUBLE SHOOTING

Generator may require removal of the generator from the engine and further checking of the generator as follows:

Check the commutator with brushes and brush connections turned back, with other bars fairly clean. Indicate grounded coils. If brushes are making good contact the commutator, and commutator looks all right, turn leads and tight and check as follows:

Open grounded leads (or brushes). Check with test lamp from "A" terminal to field. Light should not go on. If it does, the generator is grounded; rather than brush (or brush) or insulate brushes from commutator with piece of cardboard and check field. Insulate generator and brush holders to isolate ground.

Generator not grounded — Check field for open circuit.

Field is not open — Check for shorted field. Field resistance at 8 volts should be 1.35 to 2.25 ohms on 12-volt generators; at 16 volts 1.55 to 1.67 ohms on 12-volt generators. Excessive current draw indicates shorted field.

Brushes haven't yet been located, remove armature and check on grounds for short circuit.

Low Or Low Output

Check drive belt tension — Adjust as necessary.

Check brush spring and brushes for sticking — Disassemble and repair generator.

Inspect commutator for roughness, grease and dirt. If too smooth, high mica, out-of-round, burned bars — In any of these conditions, the commutator must be ground down a little and the mica undercut. In places, with burned bars which indicate an open circuit the open circuit condition must be eliminated and the armature replaced.

SECTION IV
IGNITION SYSTEM

Excessive Output

Excessive output usually results from a grounded generator field — grounded either internally, or in the regulator. Opening the field circuit (disconnecting lead from "F" terminal of regulator or generator) with the generator operating at a medium speed will determine which has the fault. If the output drops off, the regulator is causing the condition. If the output remains high, the field is grounded in the generator, either at the pole shoes, leads, or at the "F" terminal.

Noisy Generator

A noisy generator may be caused by loose mounting or drive pulley, worn, dry or dirty bearings, or improperly seated brushes. Brushes may be seated by using brush seating stone.

GENERATOR SERVICING

Periodic inspection and servicing of the generator is the best assurance for maximum service with a minimum of difficulty. It is advisable during any major engine overhaul to dismantle the generator for a thorough cleaning and inspection of all parts.

The external circuits between the generator, the voltage regulator and the battery must be kept in good condition. Defective wiring or loose and corroded connections will prevent normal generator and regulator operation. The brushes, commutator and brush spring tension should be checked when the tractor is being overhauled. A trouble analysis is given in the Regulator Servicing in this section. The generator inspection steps are as follows:

1. Inspect the terminals, external connections, wiring, mounting, pulley and belt.
2. On the Floodline Series tractor, remove the cover band and inspect the commutator. On all other Series tractors, the commutator is visible through the opening in the end frame plate. Blow dirt and dust from the inside of the generator with an air hose. The commutator may be cleaned by holding a strip of No. 00 sandpaper against it while the generator is rotating. All dirt and gum will be removed in a few seconds. A brush seating stone may also be used to clean the commutator. If the commutator is out-of-round or has high mica, the generator must be disassembled and the commutator ground down on a lathe and the mica undercut.
