- Threats pose the greatest danger to effectiveness of a bill as written. The first major threat to any piece of legislation comes from the committee that drafted the bill. The committee may change the bill during its deliberations, or it may decide not to report the bill to the House or Senate at all. The committee may also choose not to report the bill at all.
- Other organizations may pose a threat to a bill's passage. If a bill is opposed by a powerful interest group, it may be difficult to pass. The bill may be amended to address the concerns of the opposition, or it may be withdrawn.
