ABSTRACT

In this paper the RAMP Package is presented with the objective to facilitate the application of the RAMP tool to systematically manage MSD risks. The package consists of the RAMP tool (Risk Assessment and Management tool for manual handling Proactively), the RAMP website, and free, globally available online, training courses (MOOCs). An Action module used for managing identified MSD risks is introduced. The tool, encompassing a wide range of risks, is applicable to the whole risk management process. Furthermore, RAMP is openly available for download, and free to use. The RAMP tool and training materials were developed using a participative iterative methodology including researchers and practitioners. RAMP was downloaded in 86 countries in the first 26 months since its' launch and over 2400 learners from high-, middle- and low-income countries have joined the MOOCs. The RAMP Package meets organisations' needs for an accessible, comprehensive risk assessment and management tool.

1. Introduction

1.1. Background

In this paper, the challenges of creating sustainable work environments by reducing the exposure to risk factors related to manual handling at the workplace are addressed. There is an increased pressure on organisations and societies to create sustainable working conditions (UN, 2018). One area in need of attention is the risk management processes targeting decrease in musculoskeletal disorders (MSDs) as they constitute 40% of the global compensation costs of occupational and work-related injuries and diseases (ILO, 2015). In the European Union, work-related MSDs are the most frequent occupational diseases (EU-OSHA, 2019). At the societal level the costs of occupational injuries and work-related diseases in the EU have been estimated to 3.3% of the gross domestic product (Tao et al., 2017). To address this, much effort has been invested in reducing MSDs, including e.g. development and application of risk assessment tools (Takala et al., 2010; Lind, 2017). However, the prevalence and costs of MSDs remains high.

One of several limitations of most of the existing physical ergonomics

risk assessment tools is that they do not support the whole risk management process, including systematic support of developing risk reducing measures and follow-up audits as described in ISO 31000 (2009). This may limit their potential contribution to risk management. Other limitations include that the tools often only target single body regions such as the upper extremities (the Revised Strain Index, Garg et al., 2017), or are only applicable for certain types of work operations, such as lifting operations (the Revised NIOSH Lifting Equation, Waters et al., 1993). However, most jobs include a range of different types of operations and induce hazards to multiple body regions. Generally, existing tools lack a comprehensive assessment of the risks for developing MSDs. Consequently, several tools are frequently needed to conduct a comprehensive assessment (Roman-Liu, 2014). However, applying different tools may produce incompatible results (Chansson et al., 2012), which could hamper decisions for prioritisation of risk reduction measures within an organisation and may hinder comparisons between company sites when different tools are used. Furthermore, many of the assessment tools that target manual handling do not, or only partially, address organisational factors (Macdonald and Ockman, 2015) and psychosocial factors (Joksimović et al., 2002), despite the

as accident prevention theories of crew coordination and decision making must be supported by an analysis of how decisions are actually made in the real world with all its stresses and constraints training should be grounded in a thoroughgoing analysis of the complexity of the job and a full understanding of the training process itself The text will be of interest to human factors researchers and practitioners in aviation and related areas It will be of particular relevance to those who have a role in training management or regulation throughout the aviation system
