

Should Same Sex Marriage Be Legalized in The Philippines

As nations evolve, their laws must adapt to reflect societal progress and human rights. The ongoing debate about whether same-sex marriage should be legalized in the Philippines mirrors similar historical struggles worldwide. If America were to stay the same and never change, imagine where society would be. Over the course of years, people fought for their civil rights. From 1954–1968, African Americans protested and earned their freedom after slavery ended in the Civil Rights movement, fighting Jim Crow laws. Another passion-filled movement is the Women's Rights movement, which began in 1848 and continues to develop today. In this struggle for equality, women fought for their rights to work, vote, and have the same opportunities as men. The same-sex marriage movement, particularly relevant as the Philippines considers its legalization, ranks among these other powerhouse events in history. What all three movements share is their fight for equality and freedom. Denying gay and lesbian individuals the right to marry the person they love constitutes discrimination, paralleling historical injustices worldwide. Just like not letting African Americans use the same water fountain or denying women the right to vote, banning same-sex marriage represents discrimination and classification of human beings based on perceived value. As discussions continue about whether same-sex marriage should be legalized in the Philippines, it's instructive to examine landmark decisions elsewhere. On June 26, 2015, the Supreme Court favored with a 5-4 decision to legalize same-sex marriage across all 50 United States. Court Justice Anthony Kennedy was a pivotal swing vote in the case, stating, "They ask for equal dignity in the eyes of the law, and the constitution grants them that right" (Chappell 2015). This historic ruling, much like the ongoing debate in the Philippines, emerged from the Supreme Court case Obergefell v. Hodges. The case culminated after multiple state-level challenges, with states like Michigan, Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee defining marriage as exclusively between a man and a woman. Suits were filed in Federal District Courts, arguing that state officials violated the 14th Amendment by denying both the right to marry and recognition of marriages lawfully performed in other states. The petitioners included fourteen gay men and women whose partners were deceased. This case highlights crucial considerations for nations like the Philippines, where the question 'should same-sex marriage be legalized?' remains contentious. The 14th Amendment clearly establishes equal protection under law for all citizens. While civil unions were initially offered as a compromise, providing similar benefits without the term 'marriage', this parallels current debates in the Philippines and elsewhere about marriage equality. The fundamental issue transcends mere terminology - it's about equal recognition and dignity. Same-sex couples seek equal rights, just as straight couples have. There is no difference between couples except for gender identity. When considering whether same-sex marriage should be legalized, the focus must remain on fundamental human rights and dignity. When examining whether same-sex marriage should be legalized in the Philippines or anywhere else, health impacts must be considered. In 2009, the American Medical Association officially recognized that excluding sexual minorities from marriage significantly contributed to poor health outcomes.
