It was a quiet day at Guys Hospital in London in 1975, and Dr. Paul Zimmet, a young and curious medical doctor in training, was flipping through an old British medical journal when he came across an article about a diabetes study that had taken place more than a decade earlier. The study had found high rates of diabetes in Polynesians native to New Zealand and the Pacific Islands. Also an epidemiologist (a scientist who studies patterns and causes of disease in human populations), Zimmet was fascinated with this study on diabetes and found himself motivated to find other studies on the disease, particularly rates of the disease in different ethnicities around the world. In reading other articles, he learned that the Pima Indians, natives of Arizona, had the highest rates of diabetes in the world, and native Australians—the Aboriginals and the Torres Strait Islanders—had unusually high diabetes rates. Zimmet was hooked, and from that point, his career has been focused on diabetes research and the rapidly growing global diabetes pandemic (the spread of a disease across a country, a continent, or the globe).
