

Versatile input methods

There are a number of different input modalities to think about when you design apps, including touch, mouse, and keyboard. Windows 8 makes it easy to support each, by following the principle of “design for touch and get mouse and keyboard for free”.

Pointer APIs allow you to work with any input modality (mouse, keyboard, pen, touch) without knowing the origin of the input data. Higher-level gesture APIs let you use pre-defined touch gestures and detect multi-touch events in your apps. You also have the ability to build custom touch gestures or use input-specific APIs to provide a unique experience in your app.

Tailored experiences

Building experiences that take full advantage of the latest hardware is easy with Windows 8. Sensor APIs help you build apps that are tailored to the user's content, and apps scale gracefully to support both compact and large form factors.

The Windows 8 sensor platform is an end-to-end solution that includes support for both desktop and Windows Store app development. The Win32 API lets you integrate sensor data without writing a lot of code. Windows Runtime Components let you quickly access input from eight sensors, including accelerometer, inclinometer, gyrometer, compass, ambient-light, orientation, and simple orientation of a device, and, with a user's permission, geolocation.

Windows Store apps scale to ensure consistent physical sizes for UI elements regardless of the pixel density of the screen. As a developer, your work is minimal—just provide scalable resources and Windows takes care of the rest.

Tiles are connected and alive

Through tiles on the Start screen, apps are alive with activity and can deliver vibrant content, even when they're not running. Using live tiles, your app can provide useful, at-a-glance data to the user, while minimizing battery usage. Windows Push Notification Services enables your app to receive messages and send them to your app's live tile or provide a notification to the user.
