Abstract A stress response characterized by an elevated stress reaction and a diminished level of a protective stress response, referred to as the "type A" response, has been associated with atherosclerosis. However, the underlying mechanisms are not clear. The present study examined the relationship between the type A response and the autonomic nervous system (ANS) in a group of healthy young men. The type A response was measured using a standardized stress test. The ANS was measured using heart rate variability (HRV) and heart rate (HR). The results showed that the type A response was associated with a decrease in HRV and an increase in HR. This suggests that the type A response is associated with a decrease in parasympathetic activity and an increase in sympathetic activity. The findings of this study have implications for the understanding of the role of the ANS in the development of atherosclerosis.
