

ADVANCED PLAY

Notes on the World Maker — Calling brand new New Worlds “random continents” conveys something of their challenge and variability, but it doesn’t do justice to the sophistication of the program that produces them. New Worlds are not simply drawn willy-nilly. They conform to geological and cultural principles built into the program code.

There is, for instance, a plate tectonics model consulted for each creation. Mountain ranges are generated where the plates bump into each other. And secondary ranges (like the Allegheny mountains on the historical map) may be created as well.

The program also consults a cultural dissemination model for its work. The influences of major civilizations are presumed to spread outward. Consequently, pueblo dwellers generally will be found between city-states and primitive agriculturists. The model will allow for varying levels of this influence and can thus produce occasional continent arrangements which have no Incan level civilizations. Alternately, it can make very rich and powerful arrangements, ones which, like 16th-Century Japan, are highly civilized from coast to coast.

Competitive Play — Though only one player may use and save a position on a particular map disk, competitive opportunities may be created by using side 2 of the program disk to make multiple copies of a map disk. Several different players might then explore the same terrain, comparing progress periodically or simply declaring the winner to be the player with the highest totals and title by some agreed upon date. (Note: You can start a new game with a map disk without disturbing a game previously saved to that disk, but you cannot save more than one game on any given disk.)
