Goal Analysis of NSIC Women's Soccer (2014 & 2015 Seasons) Andrew Janssen, 2017 Introduction It is critical that a college soccer coach is a lifelong student of the game Analyzing information on scoring patterns trends in team sports like soccer can potentially help a coach during a game make substitutions adjust their style of play and modify formations Depending on the coach's philosophy or tactical approach he or she could coach athletes to focus their energies defensively or aggressively towards the opponents scoring tendencies Purpose The primary purpose of this study was to determine the frequency and pattern of goals scored and allowed during six 15 minute segments of a 90 minute NSIC women's soccer game A secondary purpose was to see if differences in goal scoring patterns exist between teams that finish in the top half of the conference in comparison to the bottom half of the conferences and if having home field is an advantage Methods Data was collected from all the soccer games in the Northern Sun Intercollegiate Conference NSIC during the 2014 and 2015 seasons SPSS statistical software was used to complete an Analysis of Variance ANOVA and paired t tests The scoring trends were analyzed using all teams top half teams and bottom half teams Results It determined that 344 goals and 312 were scored in the first and second half respectively More goals scored in the second half than the first half approached significance  $p = 0.09$  No statistical difference was found between the six 15 minute time segments Difference was found between home and away games with teams scoring more goals at home  $p = 0.04$  Discussion A coach could use this information to prepare for games to either maximize the advantage when playing at home or minimize the advantage on the road The data could help create team objectives for each game if they broke down teams individually Abstract
