- Treat all specimens with respect and appreciation.
- It is recommended to use gloves, an apron, and safety glasses or goggles when you dissect.
- Never cut towards your body. Always cut down, and towards the way.
- It is not your field or study dissection tools.
- Wash hands, and clean your area after completing the dissection.

How to get the best results

Arthropods are classified in the phylum Arthropoda, which are the segmented worms. Each arthropod has about 100 joint segments, supported by sclera. Each segment has muscles that help the worm move and whisk, or breathe, on the outside of the body. These arms help to anchor the worm in the soil, making movement easier.

The earthworm's digestive system contains many sections, each with a specific function. These sections are designed to work together to digest the soil that the earthworm eats. Antacids are more complex than other worms because they have a 3-way digestive tract with a mouth at one end and an anus at the other.

The northwestern's blood is enclosed in blood vessels, which is known as a closed-circulatory system. Its circulatory system is like a loop: the young blood throughout the body. There are 2 blood vessels (arterial and venous) that run the length of the worm, providing oxygen to all the cells in its body.

The northwestern's value is its primary degree of insulation. It does not have lungs, but uses cutaneous breathing, as oxygen and moisture diffuse directly. Although it also has an extensive vascular system (the capillaries) it lacks the ability to store blood. This allows the amphibian to stay in the dark, moist and where it can absorb oxygen, instead of breathing into the lungs, which are dried out.

Southwestern and Northwestern skink, assuming that they each have male A/SDS female sex organs. They still, however, need to meet in-situ. Two southwesterns will line up and exchange sperm through anastomosis. The middleman then leaves a strong bite. The southwestern slides out of the middleman and as it slides out, it passes over the egg masses and they are fertilized by the newly collected sperm. The middleman eventually passes completely off the scene and leaves an egg mass that becomes new worms.
