

Uses and Gratification Theory

It was further developed by Katz, Blumler and Gurevitch in the 1970s. According to Katz, Blumler and Gurevitch's research there were some components comprising the Uses and Gratifications Model including active audience, audience initiated media choices and media competing with other sources of satisfaction. They also proposed several needs for media consumption which are classified into following five categories:

1. Cognitive Needs: Media is used by people for acquiring information and knowledge. It is also used to develop better understanding of various concepts and issues, for example people watching documentaries, news analysis reports on current affairs etc.
