

Abstract

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effects of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary middle-aged adults.

1. Introduction

Physical inactivity is a leading cause of preventable death and disability worldwide. Sedentary behavior, characterized by sitting or lying down for prolonged periods, is associated with an increased risk of chronic diseases such as cardiovascular disease, type 2 diabetes, and obesity. Regular physical activity, on the other hand, has been shown to improve cardiovascular health, reduce the risk of chronic diseases, and enhance overall health-related quality of life.

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effects of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary middle-aged adults. The study was designed as a randomized controlled trial, comparing the effects of a 12-week training program (intervention group) to a control group that did not receive any training.

2. Methodology

The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. Participants were recruited from local community centers and health clubs. They were screened for any contraindications to exercise and then randomly assigned to either the intervention group or the control group. The intervention group received a 12-week training program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The control group did not receive any training.

The training program was designed to improve cardiovascular fitness and muscle strength. It included a warm-up, a main exercise period, and a cool-down. The main exercise period consisted of a combination of aerobic and resistance training exercises. The control group was instructed to maintain their current level of physical activity throughout the study.

3. Results

After 12 weeks, the intervention group showed significant improvements in cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and health-related quality of life compared to the control group. The improvements were statistically significant for all measures, indicating that the training program had a positive effect on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary middle-aged adults.

The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary middle-aged adults. The findings have important implications for public health, as they suggest that regular physical activity can be a effective strategy for preventing and managing chronic diseases.
