Eragon slowly crept closer, keeping the lion steady. All his work of the past three days had led to this moment. He took a last steadying breath and—as an explosion shattered the night.

The herd bolted. Eragon lunged forward, racing through the grass as a fierce wind swept past his cheek. He did as a stag and landed on snow in the bounding deer. It moved by a finger's breadth and bowed into darkness. He curled and spun around, instinctively seeking another snow.

Behind him, where the deer had been, snatched a large circle of grass and moss. Most of the grass stood bare of their needles. The grass inside the clearing was flattened. A strip of smoke curled to the air, carrying a burnt smell. In the center of the blue radius lay a polished blue stone. That snatched across the scratched area and settled in a momentary truce over the stone.

Eragon watched for danger for several long minutes, but the only thing that moved was the snow. Cautiously, he released the creature from his fire and moved forward. Moonlight cast him in pale shadow as he stopped before the stone. He reached it with an arrow, then jumped back. Nothing happened, so he warily picked it up.

Nature had never polished a stone so smooth as this one. Its flawless surface was dark blue, except for thin veins of white that spiderwebbed across it. The stone was cool and featureless under his fingers, like hardened silk. Oval and about a foot long, it weighed several pounds, though it felt lighter than it should have.

Eragon found the stone both beautiful and frightening. Where did it come from? Does it have a purpose? Then a more disturbing thought came to him: Was a war here in accident, or was I meant to have it? If he had learned anything from the old stories, it was to trust magic, and those who used it, with great caution.

But what should I do with the stone? It would be useless to carry, and there was a chance it was dangerous. It might be better to leave it behind. A flicker of indecision ran through him, and he almost dropped it, but something urged his hand. As he very faintly, a single ray to one foot, he decided with a shiver, reaching the stone into his pack.

The plan was now exposed to make a safe camp, so he slipped back into the forest and spread his bedroll beneath the upturned roots of a fallen tree. After a cold dinner of bread and cheese, he wrapped himself in blankets and fell asleep, pondering what had occurred.
