Why I am applying for a Graduate Degree in Social Work

My motivation and passion to study for a graduate degree in social work is premised on my childhood dream to give service to the community. To realize my dream, I have remained committed to gaining relevant experience in social work settings with emphasis on engaging in programs that aim at social change, problem solving and empowering people through relationships both at micro and macro levels. In these roles, I gained knowledge in capacity building and the ability to focus on not only the mental illnesses, but also how to interact with people suffering with mental problems holistically, including social and political problems that have a bearing on their health (Maillick & Caroff, 2012).

Necessary Background in the Field of Social Health

During my undergraduate studies and upon completion, I have worked as an intern in social work in which I gained various skills and attributes necessary for this profession (Coppock & Dunn, 2009). They include positive attitude, social education, and knowledge in social education theories. Additional skills involved mental counseling and guidance for patients that need primary and behavioral health treatment. Additionally, I gained in-depth skills by talking to experienced professionals in social work, including those with experiences in mental treatment, psychology and counseling. All these professionals offered me invaluable insight into the role of a social worker in delivering solutions to the community.
