Networking in the 70's usually referred to television. In the 80's social networking would possibly have been defined as a complex group of friends, acquaintances, colleagues, and the like. However, social networking since the mid 90's began to expand on the World Wide Web and has continued to do so up until present day. Granovetter theorized that the strength of weak ties lied in the innovation derived from one weak tie to another. For example, information that is privy amongst strong ties such as family friends and colleagues is well known amongst the group; however a weak tie—like a distant family member that you only see every four years at family reunions—would likely be a source of more novel information.

Likewise, that distant family member will be better suited for spreading your novel information more so than your strong ties; because your strong ties more than likely know the same people that you do. In essence the world of innovation relies on the links between large s
