

Chapter 1: Introduction to Social Work Documentation

Social Work Documentation, 2nd Edition

A Guide to Strengthening Your Case Recording

Social work documentation, like any good writing, is a skill that is built. "You might believe that good writing comes naturally for some people, but even for the experienced writer, it is hard work" (Szuchman & Thomlison, 2008, p. xi).

The Oxford English Dictionary Online defines documentation as "the accumulation, classification, and dissemination of information" ("Documentation," 2013). In social work, its meaning is even more specific. The term is well known to students and practitioners alike, despite the fact that it does not appear in the sixth edition of the Social Work Dictionary (Barker, 2014). It is a communication tool with which social workers record their work; the means by which cases are managed; and the manner in which services are evaluated, assessed, and often reimbursed. It is a required professional social work function, a permanent record of client service provision.

Social workers often have a negative response to documentation—it is the bane of many professionals' existence. To many social workers, it means spending time away from their true passion of working with clients, responding to unnecessary bureaucratic demands, and tending to tedious and boring details. Overworked social workers do not appreciate the requirement for case recording and often delay the task. The phrase "if it's not documented, it's not done" is commonly used to encourage better documentation habits, but the particulars of how to do so are less well noted.

History of Documentation

The lack of appreciation for case recording is nothing new. Colcord and Mann (1930) wrote that "the charity organization group learned early to keep records, and some of their number, as time went on, became very much dissatisfied with the clumsy way of doing things revealed by these records" (p. 585).

From the beginning of organized social work, efforts were made to record information about cases. Often, these notes were kept in public files in local offices and had minimal content (Strode, 1940). Timms (1972, p. 9) noted that early recording of service delivery took the form of a registry in which poor-relief workers entered the name of the client; the amount of cash assistance provided; the client's residence; and a few remarks such as "destitute," "very aged," or "large family." These cursory notes were often the only record of service delivery.

The next phase of documentation, beginning in the last half of the 19th century, was characterized by more detail and verification of key facts (Timms, 1972). Guidelines presented at the first national Conference of Boards of Public Charities in 1874 illustrate this type of documentation. They advised including the following items in the record:

- Kinds of mental and moral perversion;
- Descriptions of morbid and debasing conditions of the mind;
- Points at which neglect of social and moral duties began;
- Information regarding the totally idiotic or weak-minded in three generations, living and dead;
- Total inebriates in three generations, living and dead; and
