The Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences departments play a fundamental role in university education and in promoting the vision and mission of the University of Zululand. This paper explores definitions of Humanities and the Social Sciences, and the terms 'research' and 'research output', and examines the status and challenges of research management at the University of Zululand to evaluate research in the cited departments. A bibliometric method was used to analyse the trends and challenges of Humanities and Social Sciences research by using research data reflecting on ongoing and completed Arts, Humanities and Social Science research publications submitted by staff and students from 1994 – 2008 to the university's Research Office. Data was analysed by categorising research output according to overall research publication by department, publication in accredited (SAPSE) journals by each department, author productivity, and research output by categories. Pearson's correlation analysis was applied to test whether there was any correlation between registered research projects and research publications. Results indicate that strong AH&SS research engagement and publication exist at the university. Most research output was in the form of journal articles and conference papers. There was also growing postgraduate research output in the form of Masters and Doctoral dissertations. AH&SS research is generally multidisciplinary in nature. We noted that the system for capturing completed Masters and Doctoral research reports at the university is inadequate. The paper raises other issues that are important for AH&SS research and development.

Introduction

The Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences and their similarities and differences are inherently easy to confuse. The Arts and Humanities are academic disciplines that focus on the human condition. They are distinct from the Social Sciences because of the research methods used (analytical, critical and/or speculative.). Examples of these disciplines include Ancient and Modern Languages, Literature, History, Philosophy, Religion, and the Visual and Performing Arts. Scholars working in the field of the Humanities are sometimes referred to as "humanists". Kuper and Kuper (1985) define the Social Sciences as: "The fields of scientific knowledge and academic scholarship that study social groups and, more generally, human society." Contemporary social science covers a much wider field of subjects such as Philosophy, History, Demography, Anthropology, Linguistics, Social Work, Sociology, Political Sciences, Psychology, Media Studies and Cultural Studies, and Library and Information Sciences (LIS); scholars working in these disciplines are commonly referred to as "social scientists". The institutionalisation of the disciplines related to the Social Sciences only occurred in the last millennium. Although the origin of modern science has deep roots in the Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences, it has taken many years and a lot of convincing to get the orthodox academic community, who only recognised the Applied and Natural Sciences as 'sciences', to admit modern Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences into the field or family of 'science'.

Research output, how it is measured, and what measurement indicators and tools are acceptable, is still highly debated by members of the scholarly community. Research output is defined as the "textual output where research is understood as original [...] systematic investigation undertaken in order to gain new knowledge and understanding"⁵. With respect to the measurement of research output, there are those who are in favour of qualitative measures of research (e.g. Gorman, 2000; Calvert and Gorman, 2002) and strong proponents of peer review as a measure of research quality (e.g. Harnad, 1995). Similarly, there are those who favour the quantitative measurement of research impact using indicators such as citation analysis and the journal impact factor (e.g. Garfield, 1971, 1972, 1994, and 1998). For example, when defending the qualitative measures of journal quality as opposed to quantitative measures based on citedness or the impact factor, Calvert and Gorman have argued that: "The fact that paper x is cited y times is not an indicator of quality, but rather that it is cited – it is available, it is in the journal held by many libraries, the author (or publisher or editor) is particularly good at self-promotion" (Calvert and Gorman, 2002:1). Harnad (1995) is strongly in favour of peer review. In one of his seminal articles on the topic (Harnad, 1998: paragraph one) he argues that journals should not be free from the "process of peer review, whose 'invisible hand' is what maintains its quality". Put another way, scientific or scholarly
