

III Abdominal Cavity

INSTRUCTIONS: Use Figure 4.24 as a guide for making the necessary cuts through the mouse's body to expose the digestive organs in the abdominal cavity. Using scissors, begin by making a shallow incision from the base of the neck cavity along the ventral midline to the cranial aspect of the gaster opening. Do these incisions along the base of the rib (breastbone) side of and on the ventral midline to each side of the abdomen around the gaster area and about 24 and 32. Many preserved specimens contain large amounts of liquid preservative in their body cavities. You may wish to drain these out of your specimens, or use a paper towel or sponge to remove them, before proceeding with the dissection of the digestive organs.

A thin muscular layer (the diaphragm) separates the upper thoracic cavity from the lower abdominal cavity (Figs. 4.25–4.4). The role of the diaphragm will be discussed in Chapter 6. For now, concentrate your efforts primarily on the structures in the abdominal cavity that are swallowed prior to the diaphragm and into the stomach. The esophagus is a narrow tube containing smooth muscle that contracts to push food into the stomach. The stomach lies on the left side of the rabbit underneath the lungs, and does not have a cecum. It is important to note that it is responsible for storing large quantities of food, reducing materials of the food to eat constantly. A large stomach permits the rabbit to consume greater quantities of food in a short time span, and then return to a safe place to digest the meal over several hours. The stomach releases several chemical components that assist the digestive process including hydrochloric acid and pepsinogen.

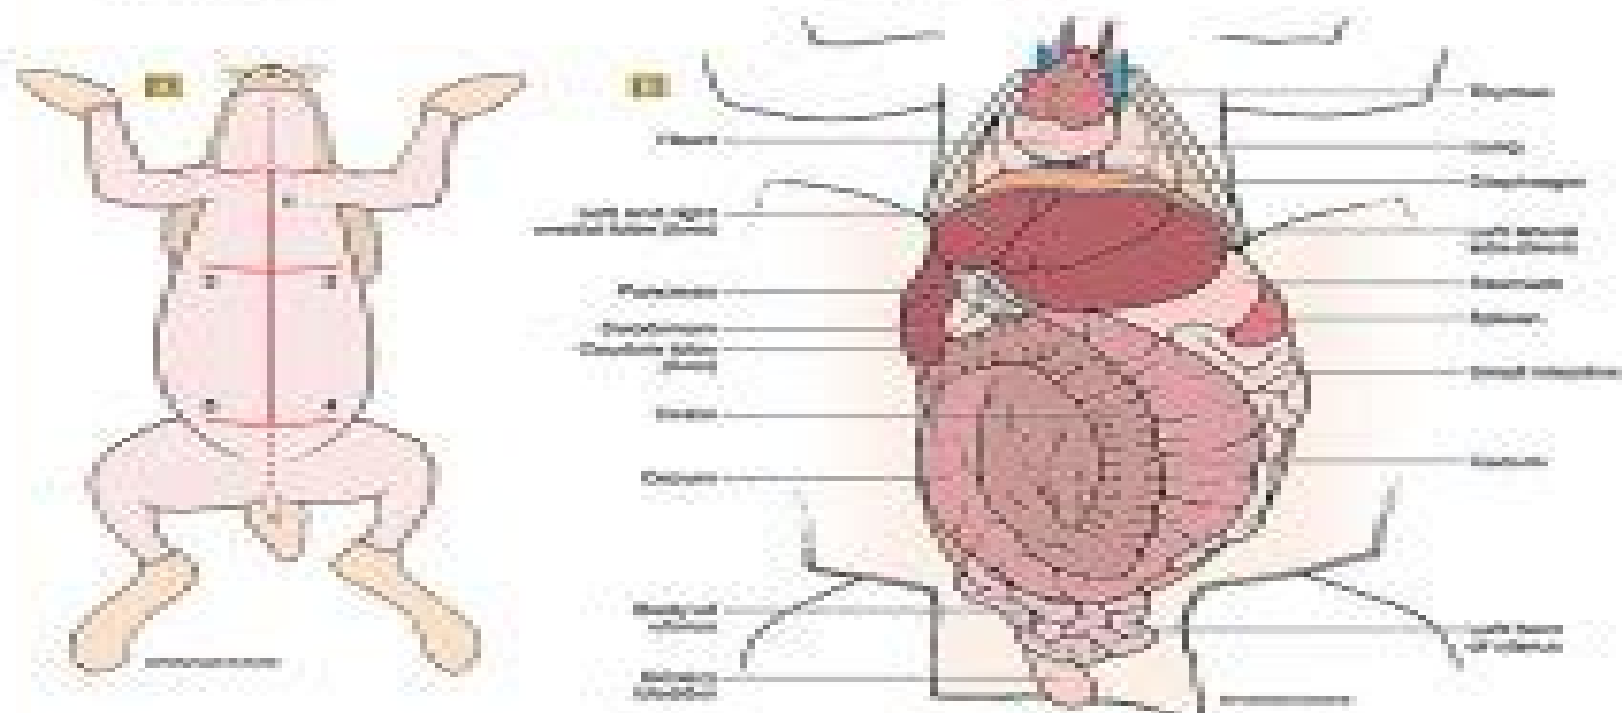

FIG. 4.24 (a) Diagram of incisions for exposing internal organs; (b) internal organs of the thoracic cavity and abdominal cavity.

Laboratory Guide to Vertebrate Dissection for Students of Anatomy Arthur Beeny Appleton, 1929 As its title indicates this is a book for use in a practical comparative anatomy course It is intended for a somewhat unusual class of student and consequently its contents outlook and method of treatment are unlike those of the standard texts in this subject As stated in the preface it is assumed that the student has already done a course in elementary zoology including the usual vertebrate types and has also examined in more detail a mammal Unless this mammal were man a number of comparisons in the book would be missed To obtain full benefit from it the student should obviously have taken the preliminary medical studies including a fair amount of human anatomy This is not meant to imply that the student of advanced zoology cannot get many useful hints and fresh points of view from its pages he undoubtedly can The types treated in a series of regional dissections are the lamprey the dogfish Squalus Necturus the lizard and the dog As it is intended for assistance in dissection information regarding osteology and the details of the central nervous system have been purposely omitted and conversely the muscles are treated somewhat more fully than is customary
