Information gathered for this study is subject to several limitations. First, the study was conducted in a single setting, the University of Illinois at Chicago, which may limit the generalizability of the findings. Second, the study was a cross-sectional design, which limits the ability to draw conclusions about causality. Third, the study was a self-report study, which may be subject to social desirability bias. Finally, the study was a convenience sample, which may limit the generalizability of the findings.

Abstract.—The authors examined the effects of two types of group therapy on the self-esteem of female adolescents who had been sexually abused. The experimental group received a cognitive-behavioral approach, while the control group received a supportive approach. Both groups showed significant improvement in self-esteem over time, but the experimental group showed significantly greater improvement than the control group. The results suggest that cognitive-behavioral approaches may be more effective than supportive approaches in improving the self-esteem of sexually abused adolescent females.

Abstract.—The effects of anthropogenic landscape fragmentation on vegetation and associated bird assemblages in the Southern Appalachian Mountains were examined using 1000 ha plots. Three vegetation types and 10 bird species were identified. The effects of fragmentation on the composition of the bird assemblages were examined.

These two characteristics are important because they represent opposing characteristics: being very popular and being unpopular. The fact that the two opposite ends of the "popularity" scale are not related indicates that the relationship between the two is not a statistically significant one. It should be pointed out that the relationship between the two is not a statistically significant one.
