Abstract

The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for coronary artery disease between two groups of men who had been exposed to asbestos during their working lives. The subjects were divided into two groups based on the duration of exposure to asbestos: those who had been exposed for less than 10 years ($n = 167$) and those who had been exposed for 10 or more years ($n = 189$). The subjects were interviewed by telephone about their smoking habits, alcohol consumption, exercise, and other factors related to coronary artery disease. The results showed that the prevalence of risk factors for coronary artery disease was significantly higher in the group exposed to asbestos for 10 or more years compared to the group exposed for less than 10 years. This suggests that prolonged exposure to asbestos may increase the risk of developing coronary artery disease.
