

Ethical Issues of Human Cloning

5 pages | 1060 words

Cloning is the process of generating a genetically identical copy of a cell or an organism, which many scientists have not yet figured out how to do so. Over the years, cloning has become a worldwide controversy on whether it should be allowed or not. People would disagree saying that cloning goes against religious critics, "It's like a man becoming creator". Other people would agree by saying that, "It could cure some disorders". I would disagree with cloning for many reasons. Cloning is more harmful to do, due to how much it fails and more people are being put at risk in doing so. In fact, over 90% of human cloning has been considered a failure, human DNA is being put at risk by that. Scientists in South Korea claimed to have successfully cloned a human embryo in 1998. The experiment was interrupted quite early when the clone was just a group of four cells. Clonaid, A man who is a part of a religious group that believes humans were created by extraterrestrials, held an intervention to announce what he claimed to be the first cloned human. However, Clonaid never presented any evidence to prove the existence of this clone. In 2002, a group of students attending Seoul National University in South Korea claimed to have created a cloned human embryo in a test tube, later finding out they had no proof. The President's Council on Bioethics wrote, "At this writing, it is uncertain whether anyone has attempted cloning-to-produce-children. Although claims of such attempts have been reported in the press,^{13,14} no credible evidence of any such experiments has been reported as of June 2002". Human cloning has not reached its full potential yet, so it will constantly fail. Not to mention how painful the procedure is to get the eggs from a woman. The process is not only painful but unsafe, and very expensive. Women are given drugs to stop the production of their ovaries, which commonly messes with the menstrual cycle. Overall, ovarian cancer could occur after getting eggs harvested, due to scarring. The eggs would have been embryos. Embryos are human beings that have not had the chance to develop all for experimental purposes. Life could be in the form of eggs, embryos, or an adult person it's wrong when it regularly fails. There are many other risks involved including the ovum donor, a nucleus donor, and a woman who bears the embryo for implantations, accompanied with all the risks to the clone in the procedure. In the end, the procedure is too difficult to perform without there being too many risks, it is not worth going through. Cloning is simply unethical, it would violate human rights in various ways. It would violate the freedom of beliefs and thoughts. Cloning would also reduce human dignity. Humans would be able to be sold as products. If we support that, we would be violating other human rights, like no one should be held in slavery or servitude right. If a clone successfully works it would raise the question of human rights to an exclusive identity for the clone. People would...
