James Lovelock's Gaia Hypothesis The Gaia hypothesis, named after the Greek goddess of earth, was first proposed by the English scientist James Lovelock in 1965. It states that the Earth is a self-regulating system, and that the living organisms on the planet are responsible for maintaining the conditions necessary for life to exist. The hypothesis was initially met with skepticism, but it has since gained widespread acceptance. It has been used to explain a wide range of phenomena, from the evolution of the atmosphere to the distribution of life on the planet.
