

The effects of temperature changes: The temperature variation between day and night causes rock to expand and to contract. This process causes cracks to develop. In time, the cracked layer peels off and falls to the ground. This process is called exfoliation (see Figure 2.15).

The effects of frost action: Due to frost action, rock breaks up into pieces and these fragments accumulate around the lower slopes of the rock. This material is called scree. Frost action is very common in the winter season in the temperate zone and in some high mountains all year round (see Figure 2.16).

The effects of plant and animal action: Plants and animals also cause weathering. For example, seeds may fall in cracks of rocks. If water collects there, it forms suitable conditions for the seeds to germinate and grow. As plants develop their roots may push the rock apart. Some animals burrow, and this also helps to break up rocks.
