B. Summary of the Data in the Table

The data in the table show that the physical sciences have consistently received the largest share of R&D funds in the United States. This is due to a number of factors, including the fact that the physical sciences are the most fundamental of the sciences and have the greatest potential for technological innovation. The life sciences have also received a large share of R&D funds, reflecting the importance of understanding the natural world and the potential for medical and agricultural advances. The earth and planetary sciences have received a smaller share of R&D funds, but this is due to the fact that this field is relatively new and has not yet reached its full potential. Engineering has received a large share of R&D funds, reflecting the importance of developing new technologies and products. The medical sciences have received a large share of R&D funds, reflecting the importance of understanding the human body and the potential for medical advances. The behavioral and social sciences have received a smaller share of R&D funds, but this is due to the fact that this field is relatively new and has not yet reached its full potential. Other sciences have received a small share of R&D funds, reflecting the fact that this field is the least well-funded of the sciences.
