

The American Nursing Shortage

Nursing workforce: Then and now

A nurse's role is extremely important in healthcare in order to deliver safe, positive and successful patient outcomes. In fact, nurses are the fastest growing and have the largest numbers in the profession, with approximately 3.9 million registered nurses in the United States alone, 29 million worldwide (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018). However, even with this substantial number, there is still a shortage of one million nurses (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018). Nursing shortages have been a discussion for many years, yet it remains an epidemic. According to the American Nurses Association (ANA), registered nursing jobs will have the highest needs through 2020, which is more than any other profession in the United States (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018).

The start of a nursing shortage began around 1936 when hospitals started to realize they did not have enough nurses to care for patients. (Penn Nursing, n.d.). With reports of a nursing shortage, healthcare workers began to reevaluate where changes could be made for improvements. Specific changes that took place were allowing an increased number of students to be accepted into nursing programs, as well as, decrease the timeframe in which students attended school, to expand the number of nurses in the workforce at a quicker rate (Penn Nursing, n.d.). It was also decided to increase the number of less-educated employees to work under registered nurses, such as certified nursing assistants. (Penn Nursing, n.d.). All these efforts have proven to be successful, however, it did not stop the nursing shortage from reoccurring (Penn Nursing, n.d.).

Today, the nursing profession faces different dilemmas, for example, nurses who are near retirement. Currently, there are approximately one million nurses over the age of 50 and within the next 10 to 15 years, there is an anticipated number of 500,000 who will be at the age to qualify for retirement, that will need to be replaced. (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018). Currently, the United States has 71 million people over the age of 65, which is the highest number in history (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018). As the population continues living longer, there is a greater need for additional healthcare services due to multifaceted health issues (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018). Another aspect of the nursing shortage today includes a decrease in nursing instructors, which could potentially lead to negative impacts on nursing programs. If there are not enough instructors to properly conduct a nursing program, this would impact the number of students that could be accepted into a program, as well as, the quality of information that is taught (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018). In return, this would result in students not receiving the full potential aspects of nursing school, leading to fewer graduates, contributing to the ongoing nursing shortage (Haddad & Toney-Butler, 2018).
