5 pages | 1095 words

According to the Institute of Medicine (2015) effective patient care is described as when patient's preferences and values are respected alongside clinical decisions which are made in response to each individual patient. Although providing effective patient care can be challenging to nurses when they utilise specific nursing concepts they can all lead to effective patient care. This essay will discuss three nursing concepts; therapeutic relationship, communication and evidence based practice and how they are important for effective patient care. The formation of a therapeutic relationship is a critical nursing concept as Arnold and Boggs (2007) supports, it encourages the idea of effective patient care. The author goes on to state that a therapeutic relationship is a personal relationship between a nurse and patient, where the patient is cared, supported and treated as an individual. Foster and Hawkins (2005) reiterate that effective therapeutic relationships between the nurses and patients are critical in healthcare. To develop a quality therapeutic relationship patients must feel respected and understood (Arnold, 2014; Rodgers, 2017). The authors continues to describe that this can be achieved through proper usage of nursing behaviours. Behaviours that convey patient respect include; active listening, consistent care and taking patients seriously. Understanding and accepting patient's with their issues and problems is vital for the formation of a nurse to client therapeutic relationship. It is critical for nurses to understand cultural dynamics of the patients, through a (2007) study from a New Zealand nurse and nurse educator Irihapeti Ramsden, found that maintaining cultural safety was found through the nurse's behaviour and attitude towards the patients to create trusting effective patient care. If the nurse does not except cultural diversity the relationship is not successful. As Batten and Holdaway (2012) argues that if the nurse fails to establish what is most important for the patient and their family this can result in loss of control, increased anxiety therefore diminishing the effect of care. In order to facilitate this relationship the nurse needs to be a good communicator. For a nurse to provide effective patient care a vital concept to be maintained is communication. "Effective communication underpins good healthcare" (Webb 2010). Being able to communicate well helps us to achieve effective patient care. As described by Kissane (2012) having good communication skills can lead to "higher patient satisfaction, greater patient adherence to treatment, better patient health outcomes, reduced patient anxiety and improved understanding" (p.20). If good communication (both verbal and non-verbal) is not provided patients can feel isolated and hopeless, "this can lead to poor co-operation and co-ordination in patient care" (World Health Organization, 2009). Patients make impressions of the nurse based on how the nurses communicate and relate with them, therefore taking time to listen will increase overall wellbeing and effective patient care. (Papagiannis, 2010; Barrett, 2012). Although good communication is vital for effective patient care McCormack (2011) claims that there should be clear boundaries of both personal and professional interactions (pg. 15). The nurse has the responsibility of knowing what constitutes appropriate professional practice and to sustain professional and personal boundaries to maintain effective patient care. As discussed by Taiwo (2014) nurses should respect the...
