

Mississippi (appropriate nursing interventions)

- Nurse immediately started fetal heart monitors
- Abdominal pain increased; Nurse paged physician
- The nurse was getting no heart tones so she asked another nurse to keep checking for a fetal heart rate while she kept paging the physician
- The physician called and said he was on his way
- The nurse documented everything
- The physician was there within minutes and delivered the baby by cesarean

Texas (incorrect)

- Nurse failed to report lengths of non-reassuring heart rates
- Nurse increased Pitocin even with late decelerations with decreased variability
- The nurse failed to maintain readable and appropriate fetal readings
- The physician was not notified of the late decelerations with decreased variability

The Mississippi nurse implemented appropriate nursing interventions, effective communication, and documentation for her 31-year-old high-risk patient. The patient came in at 33 weeks pregnant with a history of four cesareans. The nurse immediately started a fetal heart monitor and performed a vaginal exam which indicated no dilation had occurred. However, the nurse notified the provider and continued to monitor the patient due to her high-risk status. It's known that mothers who have had previous cesareans are at higher risk for a uterine rupture due to the stress of contractions (Turgut et al., 2013). Later, the patient started complaining of increased abdominal pain and the nurse wasn't able to obtain fetal heart tones so the nurse started to page the physician immediately. After the physician showed up (within minutes) the baby was delivered and the nurse documented the events that took place.

The Texas nurse failed to report and document changes that occurred. Instead, the nurse decided to increase the amount of Pitocin being delivered after failing to obtain measurable fetal heart readings (Flagg, 2022). The negligence that took place resulted in a horrific tragedy.
