Wang, P. and Soergel, D. (1998). A Cognitive Model of Document Use during a Research Project, Study 1: Document Selection. Journal of the American Society for Information Science, 49(2), 115-133.

Overview

1. What's the paper about?

The paper presents the findings and analysis of part one of a longitudinal study into how users select and use documents. It describes the selection of documents as a decision process whereby users must make choices on the potential value/worth of documents based on the surrogate information provided by Information Retrieval (IR) systems. The study does not simply analyse final document selection decisions, but the processes that lead to the decision. It uses data gathered on the process and structure of document selection during a real life situations to establish what components affect user's decisions and the cognitive processes that occur during the selection. The data were gathered based on the verbal reporting of experimental subjects before, during (using a think aloud protocol) and after the project. The authors use this data to construct a cognitive model of decision-making in the selection process, based on information provided by surrogates and the assessment of document value that leads to a decision about how the document could be used. The authors claim that the model accounts for the use of personal knowledge and decision strategies applied in the selection process. They present a set of implications on how the model can be applied to the development of an intelligent system for helping users select documents.

2. What are the contributions?

The paper presents a model of the document selection process that may be useful to better understand how users search and has implications for the design of agents to improve the effectiveness of document retrieval. The main purpose of the paper was to use data from those with expertise and experience in document selection to improve the mechanisms used by IR systems to select documents and to improve how retrieval results are presented by default and facilitate the customization of this activity. Other contributions aside from the cognitive model of the document decision process include:

- A deeper understanding of how users select documents for later use
- A broad taxonomy of relevance criteria
 - where topicality was not always the basis for positive judgments
 - personal knowledge and document value are separate components of the model, not part of criteria
- A more complete understanding of:
 - what document representations were important
 - the extent to which each representation was important
 - what representations that were not available are potentially important
