

Nursing Admission Essay

Caring for others has always run in the family, from my great grandparents to my own parents, who are a nurse and a doctor. Growing up, I also knew that I would enter the medical field in order to provide care and comfort to patients on a daily basis. Although during college I considered other pursuits, it was a medical service trip to the Philippines that really cemented my belief that nursing was my true career calling. During my trip there, I realized that although the work was often times not glorious, the human connections made simply through compassionate care would be able to alleviate suffering and speed recovery.

I had started college with the desire to explore my options, and I had signed up for the service trip on a whim, hoping that perhaps I would also find my calling as a translator or an engineer. However, from day one I found myself drawn to the patients in the makeshift clinic that had been set up. Despite my halting Tagalog, I was able to form fast friendships with mothers and sick children, or young children with sick parents. It made me reevaluate not only the position I held in the world, but what I wanted to do with my position in the world. I wanted to be a part of these people's lives and to ensure that they received the care they needed. After returning to college from my trip, I dedicated myself to nursing studies, knowing that it was indeed the path that I was passionate about taking.

Now that I have completed my undergraduate requirements for a pre-nursing degree, I am eager to join a program which will allow me to hone not only my academic knowledge, but also my clinical knowledge as well. I look forward to working with patients in a hospital setting, which will expose me to cases which I have never experienced. Only through these types of situations can I truly enhance my emergency response skills, and I look forward to the challenge. Admission to nursing school is the next leg in my journey towards becoming a nurse, and I will apply myself diligently to my studies so that I can save and enhance lives in the future.
