

compounds synthesised in the photosynthetic leaves are exported to all other parts of the plant including storage organs. From the storage organs they are later re-exported. The mineral nutrients are taken up by the roots and transported upwards into the stem, leaves and the growing regions. When any plant part undergoes senescence, nutrients may be withdrawn from such regions and moved to the growing parts. Hormones or plant growth regulators and other chemical signals are also transported, though in very small amounts, sometimes in a strictly polarised or unidirectional manner from where they are synthesised to other parts. Hence, in a flowering plant there is a complex traffic of compounds (but probably very orderly) moving in different directions, each organ receiving some substances and giving out some others.

11.1 MEANS OF TRANSPORT

11.1.1 Diffusion

Movement by diffusion is passive, and may be from one part of the cell to the other, or from cell to cell, or over short distances, say, from the inter-cellular spaces of the leaf to the outside. No energy expenditure takes place. In diffusion, molecules move in a random fashion, the net result being substances moving from regions of higher concentration to regions of lower concentration. Diffusion is a slow process and is not dependent on a 'living system'. Diffusion is obvious in gases and liquids, but diffusion in solids is more likely rather than of solids. Diffusion is very important to plants since it is the only means for gaseous movement within the plant body.

Diffusion rates are affected by the gradient of concentration, the permeability of the membrane separating them, temperature and pressure.

11.1.2 Facilitated Diffusion

As pointed out earlier, a gradient must already be present for diffusion to occur. The diffusion rate depends on the size of the substances; obviously smaller substances diffuse faster. The diffusion of any substance across a membrane also depends on its solubility in lipids, the major constituent of the membrane. Substances soluble in lipids diffuse through the membrane faster. Substances that have a hydrophilic moiety, find it difficult to pass through the membrane; their movement has to be facilitated. Membrane proteins provide sites at which such molecules cross the membrane. They do not set up a concentration gradient; a concentration gradient must already be present for molecules to diffuse even if facilitated by the proteins. This process is called facilitated diffusion.

In facilitated diffusion special proteins help move substances across membranes without expenditure of ATP energy. Facilitated diffusion cannot cause net transport of molecules from a low to a high concentration – this would require input of energy. Transport rate reaches a maximum when all of the protein transporters are being used (saturation). Facilitated

Reiss, 2023-08-24 Science education particularly school science education has long had an uneasy relationship with ethics being unsure whether to embrace ethics or leave it to others In this book the authors argue that while the methods of science and of ethics are very different ethics plays a key role in how science is undertaken and used And so ethics has a central place in science education whether we are talking of school science education for students of all ages or the informal science education that takes place in through internet books magazines TV and radio or in places such as hospitals and zoos Written for science educators based in schools and elsewhere the authors make no assumptions that the reader has any knowledge of ethics beyond the background understandings of morality that virtually all of us have Empowered with the knowledge shared in this book readers will feel confident about the place that ethics has in science education The authors provide a rich array of examples as to how science education both in school and out of school and for all ages can be enhanced through including teaching about ethics Phoenix Wilderness Area, Proposed Wilderness Program ,1987 Proposed Wilderness Program for the Phoenix Wilderness EIS Area ,1984 Identity Formation, Youth, and Development James E. Overcoming Students' Misconceptions in Science Mageswary Karpudewan,Ahmad Nurulazam Md Zain,A.L. Chandrasegaran,2017-02-28 This book discusses the importance of identifying and addressing misconceptions for the successful teaching and learning of science across all levels of science education from elementary school to high school It suggests teaching approaches based on research data to address students common misconceptions Detailed descriptions of how these instructional approaches can be incorporated into teaching and learning science are also included The science education literature extensively documents the findings of studies about students misconceptions or alternative conceptions about various science concepts Furthermore some of the studies involve systematic approaches to not only creating but also implementing instructional programs to reduce the incidence of these misconceptions among high school science students These studies however are largely unavailable to classroom practitioners partly because they are usually found in various science education journals that teachers have no time to refer to or are not readily available to them In response this book offers an essential and easily accessible guide
