Def: Select n elements from a population of size N . If each selection has an equal chance of being selected then we say the sample of n elements was a random sample. Simple random sample

Definition: A simple random sample is a subset of a finite population such that each of its n elements is equally likely to be chosen.

Definition: A cluster sample is a sample consisting of elements that belong to one cluster in the population.

• When a particular cluster is included in the sample, all elements in that cluster are included in the sample.

Suppose the population is divided into clusters, such as the neighborhoods in a city. When a cluster is chosen, a list of all its elements is obtained by random selection, and a list of clusters is chosen randomly. In this case, the population is divided into clusters, and a cluster is chosen from the list of clusters, and then all its elements are included in the sample.

Definition: A judgment cluster sample involves the selection of one of the listed clusters by someone's judgment, and then the elements in that cluster are included in the sample.

For an example, suppose we are studying the health of a group of people. The list of all the people in the population is divided into clusters, such as the neighborhoods in a city. When a cluster is chosen, a list of all its elements is obtained by random selection, and a list of clusters is chosen randomly. In this case, the population is divided into clusters, and a cluster is chosen from the list of clusters, and then all its elements are included in the sample.
