

The Effects of Text Messaging During Dual-Task Driving Simulation

It is not a secure association to intertwine driving in conjunction with creating text messages while driving. This is because the risks involved in writing text messages while driving are dangerous or lethal. Text messaging while driving has a great influence on driving capabilities. This is because text messaging while driving tend to decrease time spend looking at the road and approaching vehicles as compared to time spend staring at the road written to baseline states or conditions. Further, text-messaging driver's diversity or variability in lane on the roads increases significantly in that most drivers who tend to write a text while driving would miss his lane (Fitzgard, 2013). Text messaging while driving has a negative impact simulated driving show on performance, which is more intense than driving while talking on a phone. Research on the behaviors of driving while talking on a phone has rapidly increased (Corbett & Park, 2004). The prevailing analysis shows that dual-task condition do happens while driving which lead to lack of concentration and control of the vehicle. Text messaging while driving has a negative impact on simulated driving performance. It is significant to note that anyone making a text message on his or her cell phone tends to concentrate more on creating a message than concentration on how to control the vehicle (Hale, 2001).

According to the recent research, harmful effects do happens on the distracted driver who in turn crashes the vehicle due to the influence of texting messages. The impact is so huge particularly on the reaction time since the accident exposes the driver to an external reaction. This effect is triggered by the surge that arises in the frequency level of reaction, which in turn improvise and triggers physiological response human body. The composition of a text messages
