

THOMPSON: AUGUSTINE AND THE DEATH PENALTY

punishment. What about Jesus' rebuke of Peter and the drawing of his sword at Gethsemane? Peter was wrong because he was not a duly constituted authority. In conclusion, Augustine states unequivocally that an execution by a duly authorized authority according to "law or the rule of rational justice" is not a violation of Christian principles of justice.⁵⁹

In addition to biblical precedents, Augustine accepts the right of criminal punishments including execution as part of the pax Romana. Echoing Paul to some degree, he realized that state authorities have their "purpose" in stabilizing life. Even the "barbed hooks of the executioner" has its "causes," "reasons" and "practical benefits."⁶⁰ Augustine's acceptance of the right of the state to such punishments, whether based on Biblical precedents or the securing of civic peace, was not unqualified. Only the proper authorities to further the common good of the society and as a deterrent to further criminal actions can impose it. An execution is an unusual measure that should be used only in cases of extreme necessity where no other option appears feasible. The Church can and should be a forceful advocate of mercy for the condemned, because God is just and can forgive a sinful humanity that includes both the prosecutors and the condemned. The officers of the state do no "injury to their office if they show mercy to those over whom they have the lawful power of life and death."⁶¹

The consistent plea of the Church for mercy follows from Augustine's recognition in the Donatist controversy that the Church cannot advocate the death penalty, but must advocate for the mildest possible punishments consistent with the appropriate ends of the law. Thus, Augustine accepts the primacy of mercy for Christians and the primacy of judgment in the secular realm. This is not a simplistic division. Judgment, within some limits, is a vigorous part of religious discipline. The initial reluctance of Augustine to advocate more than persuasion against the Donatists is modified into increasingly harsh judgments by practical considerations of their intransigence and violence, by theological evolutions regarding free will, and by the increasingly intertwined connections between the imperial authorities and the Church. There is an intense temptation to advocate state action in this environment in order to limit external actions and force a reconsideration of internal dispositions.
