THE ART OF COMPLAINING EFFECTIVELY

You don't have to accept defective goods or poor services. When you're dissatisfied with a purchase, you need to tell the seller about it and ask for a refund or a replacement. Complaining gives the business the opportunity to correct the problem and keep you as a customer. However, complaining effectively often requires being calm, persistent and well-prepared.

Here are some tips to help you complain effectively:

Keep records of purchases. It's best to be prepared in case you have a problem with a purchase. Keep all documents related to purchases, including sales receipts, manuals, repair orders, warranties, canceled checks, contracts, any correspondence with the business, and ads describing the product. When making a major purchase, find out whom to contact and what to do if a problem arises.

Report a problem right away. Always let the seller know as soon as trouble starts, so there's no question about when the problem began. If possible, go back to the salesperson who sold you the item. Have a reasonable attitude and state exactly what you want—for example, a refund of your money. Many businesses may honor your request or offer alternatives, such as a store credit.

Ask to speak to someone in authority. If you're not satisfied, politely let the salesperson know you don't accept the offer and wish to pursue the matter further. You might ask, "Who else can I talk to?" Then, go up the chain of command, speaking with the next person who has authority to make a decision. If the seller is willing to look into your complaint, give him or her time to check with others and call you back.

Stay calm. It may be natural to become frustrated or angry if you have to tell your story more than once. But stay calm. Success often rests on your ability to remain reasonable and unflustered throughout the process. If angry, you're more likely to present your case in a way that diverts attention away from the real issue. As long as someone in authority is willing to talk with you,
