1986, and 1989, I argued that as scholars' and students' initial study centers, they study Chinese literature as a "text" (textualization) and that this textualization is a political act that creates particular social relations. This act is, for Lynda and the Japanese, a move out of the way of long-standing theories of the Japanese and the Japanese literature that have been, as a result, a barrier to the study and the possible historic progress of the Japanese literature. I have indicated that by creating a "text" (textualization) and the possible progress of the Japanese literature, the Japanese have been able to create a new space of the Japanese literature.
