Emissions and Environmental Law Actions

- Geopolitical risk: given the strong focus on greenhouse gas reduction from international negotiations, could influence trade negotiations for the next negotiated climate agreement.
- Policy focus on oil & gas transition: e.g., new energy efficiency laws, or green building codes. Increased focus on fossil fuels in state climate action plans could increase political support for fossil fuel energy transition, but will likely prioritized with other national concerns such as climate justice issues.
- Regulatory focus on industry emissions: new rules impacting fossil fuel use, including air pollution and energy efficiency standards, may have significant policy outcomes.
- Decarbonization of electricity generation: increasing the use of low-carbon generation sources like wind, solar, and hydropower.
- Decarbonization of transportation: increasing use of EVs and non-combustion energy vehicles. Changes in federal regulations regarding greenhouse gas limits for road and rail-based transportation emissions.

Recovering from Disruption through Preparedness (Section 10.2)

- Recovery and Resilience: new opportunities for community resilience and local economic regeneration after disruption. Building on what it takes for cities and governments to become resilient requires a thoughtful evaluation of:
 - 1. Infrastructure
 - 2. Critical assets, land, waters, and ecosystems
 - 3. Emergency preparedness
 - 4. Sustainability standards and benchmarks
 - 5. Resiliency practices from neighboring communities
 - 6. National resources that assist local governments in recovery and resilience
 - 7. International experience from leading organizations
 - 8. Collaboration of government and nongovernmental organizations
 - 9. Community and corporate resilience best practices and lessons learned
 - 10. New technologies and tools for resilience, including new data and information sharing and appropriate models.
- Recovering the economy: short-term, investment-driven growth, subject to market forces and risk, cannot easily recover from prolonged economic disruption. For example, infrastructure
