Introducing the Plot Diagram Banner

Tell students to raise their hands if they have ever ridden a roller coaster. Call on a few students with their hands raised and ask them which part of the roller coaster they liked best. If students have trouble answering this question, guide them by being more specific. For example: Is it more fun when the coaster is climbing a hill, or is it better when it races down a hill? Continue until you have a variety of responses. Acknowledge that there are many parts of a roller coaster ride, and point out how those parts all work together to create the full experience of the ride. Climbing the hill helps build anticipation and makes the perch at the top exciting. If the roller coaster ride ended at the top of the hill, riders would be disappointed because it would feel like the ride was incomplete. Direct the students' attention to the Plot Diagram Banner. Point out that, much like a roller coaster, a story must have a beginning, middle, and an end to give readers a complete experience. Tell students that this series of events in a story is known as the plot.

Plot Parts

Make copies of the Plot Parts Cards. Reproducible and use scissors to cut out each of the five plot element sections. (For repeated use, consider using poster stock when making the copy and laminate each plot element section.) Choose a story that students have read recently and know well. Tell students that they will be using the Plot Diagram Banner to practice identifying the different parts of that story. Divide students into five groups and tell each group that it will be responsible for presenting one plot element of the story to the class. Assign each group one of the following plot elements: exposition, rising action, climax, falling action, and resolution, and give each
