Water is not present in the piping until the system operates. The sprinkler piping is pressurized with air at a maintenance pressure that is relatively low compared to the water supply pressure. To prevent the higher water supply pressure from forcing water into the piping, the design of the dry pipe valve intentionally includes a larger valve clapper sectional area exposed to the maintenance air pressure, as compared to the water pressure. Operation of the dry pipe equipment occurs when fire temperature fuses a sprinkler, allowing sprinkler piping air pressure to escape. This destroys the pressure differential that normally keeps the dry valve closed and allows water to flow into the sprinkler piping. The air pressure required to keep the clapper in a closed position varies directly with the water supply pressure.

Typically, the dry valve is installed in a heated area or in an insulated, heated valve enclosure protected against any occurrence of freezing temperatures. When one or more of the automatic sprinklers is exposed to sufficient heat, it operates, allowing the maintenance air to vent from that sprinkler. As the air pressure in the piping drops, the pressure differential across the dry pipe valve changes, allowing water to enter the piping system (see Figures 1-9 and 1-10). Water flow from sprinklers needed to control the fire is delayed until the air is vented from the sprinklers. For this reason, dry pipe systems are usually not as effective as wet pipe systems in fire control during the initial stages of the fire. To compensate for the time delay, dry sprinkler system hydraulic area requirements are typically greater than that of a traditional wet system.

A hydraulically operated fire alarm is standard; however, many installations also have an electric fire alarm gong that sounds when water flow into the sprinkler piping system actuates the alarm switch. This electric switch can also be used to signal the building's main fire alarm control panel.
