

Cyber Bullying and Bullying in Schools

In a study done to determine the frequency of bullying in two groups of middle school-going children, one group was made up of children with learning disabilities and the other without limitations. In this research, different socio-ecological predictors were used to assess the students. The authors found out that gender, race, grade results and level of participation in other activities influenced the amount of bullying (Rose et al., 2013). On the other hand, the study found out that the level of bullying decreased among those with high peer social support. Such students also faced lower levels of victimization and anger from those without disabilities.

This research conclusively shows how increased peer support is a protector towards bullying among those with disabilities. When students with intellectual weaknesses have their peers, they get necessary support to hold onto. They also get physical and emotional protection from others who desire to victimize them. These students also relate well with an extended friendship courtesy of their peers. In the end, they get to be understood and cared for. The study by Rose et al. (2013) therefore highlights the significance of social-ecological predictors towards bullying.

Kokkinos and Antoniadou (2013) also evaluate the incidence of self-reporting of bullying and victimization by students in elementary schools. This study looked at the instances of bullying among those with specific learning weaknesses. The 346 participants had to meet criteria for Specific Learning Disabilities (SLD), and so only 50 participated in the survey. The participants filled a self-administered questionnaire that measured the level of bullying and victimization. Interestingly, students with SLD acted more as bully and victimization victims than those without the condition. The results showed no significant difference between adolescents with SLD and those without in terms of using aggressive behaviors.

The study by Kokkinos and Antoniadou (2013) does not mirror other studies, which show that students with SLD suffer more bullying and victimization than their counterparts. It, therefore, means that a lot is being done to identify the specific predictors of bullying. Rose et al. (2013) suggest that students with learning disabilities are prone to bullying. The reasons are similar in each context. Perhaps, other studies need to identify why there is no difference in aggressive behaviors between SLD students and non-
