

Nurse-Patient Relationship: Effective Communication

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Nora Jones is a 48-year-old Aboriginal lady who has been diagnosed with end stage kidney disease. She has been treated with haemodialysis for the past three months in a large Brisbane Hospital. Nora is from a remote Aboriginal Community and has been staying with her cousin between treatments but misses her home and her community.

Recently, Nora's community has been provided with a peritoneal dialysis clinic. In view of Nora's wish to return to her home, she has been offered the option to return to her community and commence peritoneal dialysis in place of haemodialysis. Even though the change in treatment will impact on her health outcomes, Nora has decided to return to her remote area home.

Effective communication and cultural safety are the key factors influencing the development of a nurse patient therapeutic relationship when working with Nora.

Personal rapport and trust relationship between Aboriginal Australians and non-Aboriginal nursing staff is important for enhancing the patients' understanding of significance of treatment in order to prevent their refusal from medical services. Nelson & Allison (2007) pointed at "the importance of devoting time specifically for building relationships, rather than being too quick to launch into the therapeutic activity" (p. 58). Due to their ethnical background and experience of racial discrimination, Indigenous patients feel uncomfortable being separated from their accustomed surrounding and put trust neither in non-Aboriginal nurses nor in medical services in general. Making efforts to establish a rapport with Nora, the medical staff should bear in mind that English might be her fourth or fifth language and this might complicate the process of communication significantly. "Many Indigenous patients were not properly prepared for surgery due to language difficulties. (Academic research library, 2008, p. 22).

Nora, as well as other Aboriginal patients, requires individual approach considering the differences in language skills and communication traditions. Another problem is caused with difficulties of receiving more or less certain feedback from Indigenous patients. They are inclined to agree to everything instead of asking questions and
