Science requires a carefully kept notebook of precise facts, a characteristic used for testing experimental efforts at understanding the natural world. Science uses systematic theory and precise, well-defined species and locale labels for precise record of data—positions of objects.

Science researchers create systematic labels with systematically produced standardized language labels. These labels are produced (they are identified (a, b, c) and all other as required in identification; they are used as a reference to:

- a) name observed and recorded objects as described, assigned species or standardized objects that represent species, sub-species, etc.
- b) label published name (scientific name) that represents living (biological) organisms.

2. Use the 10-minute for Relationship Diagrams from page 1-3. The relationship diagrams include the following notes and questions (a) from page 1 (page 1 only):
